Ten years in graphic design and visual communication, working across print and digital. I studied multimedia design and visual communication full-time for two years, followed by additional training in photography and video editing, and I'm Adobe Certified in Photoshop, InDesign, and Illustrator.

Design is where the focus stays: taking a business's story and telling it properly. Personal. Original. A little quirky when the brief allows it. Photography and video sit alongside that work when a project calls for them, but the craft this portfolio is built around is design, start to finish.

Exploring a range of design movements, from brutalism and grunge to deconstructivism, surrealism, and Swiss modernism, has shaped and continually reshaped my personal style. That range means I can adapt seamlessly to different brands and visual identities, rather than imposing one look on every project. Outside of client work, I sketch using a drawing tablet, always looking for ways to expand my craft and bring more value to the people I work with.

Dare to be Different.

A new line of masking tapes joined the Bulldog Abrasives range, and I was trusted with the updated brochure design. That meant new product photography for every item, background removal and retouching, and the full design and layout of the brochure itself.

The inspiration came from marketing material we'd received from overseas suppliers in Finland, Germany, and Greece. I wanted something that would make an immediate impression. A landscape orientation set it apart from the rest of the range's brochures, printed on 170gsm matte-laminated stock and saddle stitched.

Internal feedback was positive, and the brochure achieved exactly what it set out to do. From concept to photography to final print-ready file, I owned this one start to finish.

A new range of flap discs, launched under a newly created brand: Valkren.

Valkren was inspired by Vikings, and I leaned into that association for the design concept. I moved away from existing flap disc conventions and opted for something that dares to be different.

The base for the label was the background, which was made from viking stock images that were edited in Photoshop with a threshold effect, a gradient map, and some noise added for texture.

The die line was set up in Illustrator, where the text, iconography, logo, and barcode were added.

The design remained fairly similar across the product line for consistency, with only the colours and names separating them.

Spray Guard launched a few months before this polishing machine arrived from a Chinese manufacturer. The range was built mainly for automotive products, plastic film and masking tapes at first, with polishers joining shortly after.

I was responsible for the packaging and outer box design for the new machine. Spray Guard's logo was purple, so I drew inspiration from Razer's packaging: the Taiwan-based computer peripheral manufacturer known for its vibrant green and black. A duotone of purple and black felt like the natural translation of that same confidence for this project.

Photoshop was used to remove the background from the polisher image, while the rest of the design was set up in Illustrator on a die line.

I designed monthly special offers for four industries: Automotive, Industrial & D.I.Y, SATA (spray guns), and HB Body (automotive refinishing products).

Each offer had a tight turnaround: designed only after the 21st of the month, revised, then sent to customers before the month closed out, a narrow window that left little room to spare.

This poster was designed for the R-M paint brand, featuring the winner of the notorious Paint or Die Trying competition as the brand's ambassador, a symbol of what women can achieve in any industry.

The design worked within R-M's CI guidelines throughout: simple, yet clear.

A freelance design company, still in its infancy, needed business cards designed. With no website yet and the business still finding its feet, I focused on their services instead, and added QR codes linking to their social pages.

Flawless Results

High-performance body fillers designed for every stage of automotive repair. From structural rebuilds to ultra-fine finishing. Carsystem delivers consistency, and a flawless surface every time.

Carsystem's range of professional body fillers is engineered to give you complete control at every stage of repair. Whether you're shaping, reinforcing, levelling, or refining, each formulation is designed to perform with precision, consistency, and ease of application.

From versatile standard fillers to specialised solutions reinforced with steel, aluminium, or fibreglass, every product is developed to meet the demands of modern workshops. Lightweight multifunctional fillers reduce effort without sacrificing strength, while liquid and sprayable options ensure seamless finishing across complex surfaces.

The result is simple: faster workflows, reliable performance, and a surface that's ready for perfection.

A Rebirth Begins: Building Restoring A Classic 1966

Written by Bryce Anderson

Ferry Porsche famously said, "In the beginning, I looked around and could not find quite the car I dreamed of, so I decided to build it myself."

It's no surprise that since then, few cars have been as the perennial Porsche. The car that

A Stake in Everyone's Development

At Germiston, restoration work extends beyond Patricia. The workshops maintain heritage rolling stock and safeguard assets stored on site. Some of the machinery used here dates back as far as Patricia herself does.

The largest fully refurbished wheel-turning lathe in the world is one machine capable of keeping this particular lathe in top condition. The work is niche, certainly. But it's not trivial.

Economic implications as well. Rail have demonstrated...

Current page: Patricia finally brought back to life and unveiled to the public. Once abandoned following the collapse of SANRASM, the locomotive was acquired in 2017 by rail heritage supporter Clive Holliday, who funded the project in honour of his late mother.

A Modern South Africa Unbridled By Its Roots

In a country where inequality remains stark and industrial capacity has fluctuated over decades, working machines from the past can become powerful symbols of education and introspection. They show that complex systems can be understood, dismantled, and rebuilt anew. They embody problem-solving.

Patricia's own story carries that resonance through. She survived a Boer war, two world wars, industrial expansion, the decline of steam, years of heavy mining service and near abandonment.

Her restoration was funded privately by Clive Holliday after he purchased the locomotive from SANRASM, named in honour of a family legacy, and completed through persistence rather than institutional backing.

She will not stand static in a museum. The intention is for her to return to work, hauling heritage passenger trains, and doing what she was built to do more than a century ago. In that sense, at least, her story is far from over. And serves as an adage in continuity.

Heritage does not belong to one generation or one community. As South Africa's younger generations, Millennials, Gen Z, and those that follow reinterpret the country's past through their own experiences, machines like Patricia offer a shared entry point. They are artefacts of industry, of labour, of infrastructure and of ambition. They carry complex histories and sometimes painful memories, but they also carry solace.

Persistence, at its best, is not about longing for what more about deciding what is worth carrying forward.

When steam rises from Patricia's chimney, it signals a return to 1987. It will mark an equally significant that specialised restoration remains possible and that craftsmanship and commitment can still be.

The Skeleton in the Frame

Unlike modern machines, steam locomotives reveal themselves entirely. Their workings are visible; pistons move, rods articulate, valves open and close mostly in plain sight. There is very little hidden circuitry.

For children encountering steam for the first time, the reaction is immediate and instinctive... awe at the scale, fascination with the motion, curiosity about how it all fits together.

Your ceiling

Every person who told you it wasn't possible was giving you information, just not the kind they intended. They were telling you about their limits, not yours. About their fear dressed up as advice. You took it all in, let it fuel you, and kept going anyway. That's the difference between you and them. Not talent. Not luck. Just the refusal to stop.

There is a certain kind of person who mistakes familiarity for understanding. Who assumes that because they know your name, they know your ceiling. They don't. They never did. You operate on a frequency they haven't been trained to hear. That's not arrogance. That's just fact. Keep moving. Their confusion is not your concern.

When Nietzsche declared that God is dead, he was celebrating destruction as well as diagnosing a cultural shift. The moral structures that once guided society had lost their authority, leaving a vacuum of meaning. The question was what replaces God, and who.

His answer was radical responsibility. Each individual must create values strong enough to stand without divine approval. This act of self-creation defines human potential. The future belongs to those willing to shape it.

Nietzsche proposed a severe thought experiment: what if you had to live your life again and again, exactly as it is, for eternity? Would you curse the repetition, or affirm it?

This idea, known as eternal recurrence, is not cosmological but confrontational. It demands a life lived deliberately. To affirm existence fully is to live in such a way that repetition becomes a triumph, not a punishment.
